THE THREE-LEGGED STOOL

OR: ANGLICAN SOURCES OF AUTHORITY

RICHARD HOOKER

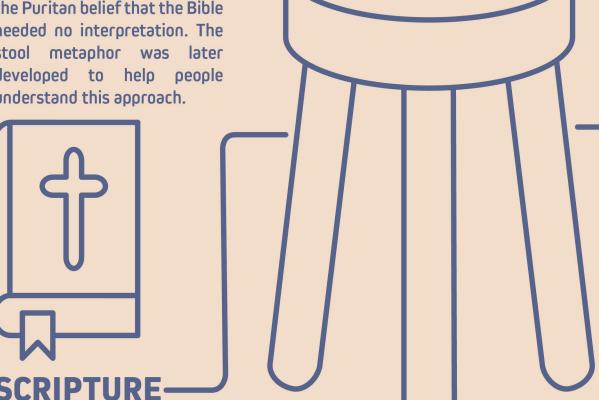

The 16th-century Anglican theologian Richard Hooker is credited with proposing these three sources. He sought a middle way between a Catholic overreliance on tradition and the Puritan belief that the Bible needed no interpretation. The stool metaphor was later developed to help people understand this approach.

Anglicanism, which includes The Episcopal Church, accepts three sources of authority for theological reflection about God and the World: Scripture, Tradition, and Reason. These three together are frequently called the three-legged stool.

REASON

Reason is more than logic. It encompasses the human capacity to discern truth about God and the world through observation, logic, and intuition. Thus, for Anglicans, reason also includes experience.

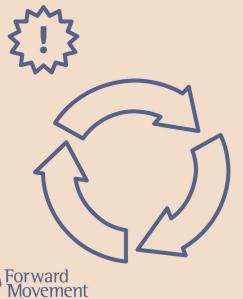

The Holy Scriptures, or the Bible, are those books written by human beings and inspired by God that serve as the source for God's revelation against which all other Christian teaching is evaluated. For Anglicans, the Bible includes the Old and New Testaments and the Apocrypha.

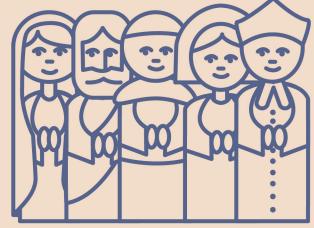

Some ask whether the stool is the best metaphor for the sources of authority. Some thinkers contend that Hooker saw reason and tradition as the means to interpret scripture, which is the highest authority. If so, the image of the ladder may be more appropriate.

The Church's ongoing reflection about God and God's activity in the world that has been handed down through history.

Some people say that the three sources need to be equal because otherwise the stool would not have equal legs and would therefore tip over. Still, this does not make the sources independent from each other. Each needs to be used in conjunction with the other two.
